

2013 Season — The Bowman Bowl & Samurai's Heartbreak

League Overview

2013 was Samurai's masterpiece... until it wasn't. As commissioner, he fine-tuned the new IDP system (DEx1, DTx1, CBx1, Sx1, LBx2, D×1) and prepared the league for its transition into keeper format. On the field, he built a juggernaut — nearly 3,000 PF (2,968.58), the only franchise ever to post a 300-plus-point week, and a 223-point gap on the next-closest scorer. By every measure, Samurai's roster was one of the most dominant in league history.

But destiny had other plans. In what became known forever as The Bowman Bowl, Samurai lost the Super Bowl in the cruelest way possible: a NaVorro Bowman fumble tease followed by a 99-yard pick-six that flipped the matchup. TBone Manglers claimed his second title — this time not with dominance, but with divine luck.

The 2013 Super Bowl

Matchup: TBone Manglers (7-6, 2604.07 PF, 2523.87 PA) vs. Samurai (10-3, 2968.58 PF, 2548.86 PA)

Samurai entered as the overwhelming favorite, boasting one of the most dominant teams ever assembled. Nearly 3,000 points on the year, a 300+ point game, and complete statistical superiority over TBone.

The Super Bowl seemed to follow script: Samurai led going into the last active game with TBone with the lone remaining active player. When Navorro Bowman fumbled an onside kick in the final moments, TBone actually lost fantasy points. Samurai's lead stretched even further, and victory felt inevitable.

But Bowman wasn't finished. On the ensuing drive, he redeemed himself with one of the wildest defensive plays of the decade: intercepting Matt Ryan at the goal line and returning it 99 yards for a touchdown. In one sequence, Bowman overcame his own mistake, piling on 17.5 points for TBone in one play and swinging the entire matchup.

Final: TBone 203.13 – Samurai 189.48.

Thus the "Bowman Bowl" was born. If Bowman doesn't fumble San Fran kneels it, Samurai wins. If Bowman doesn't pick-six, Samurai wins. Instead, Bowman did both, and TBone became a two-time champ, his second ring minted by the wildest defensive twist ever seen.

Team-by-Team Arcs

TBone Manglers — (7-6 | PF: 2604.07 | PA: 2523.87 | Champion | later Tbone Diva Manglers)

The Manglers' 2013 season was a masterclass in chaos turned championship. They didn't dominate; they survived — limping into the playoffs at 7–6 after a rollercoaster regular season that saw as many heartbreaks as highlights. Early on, Nick Foles and Antonio Brown were streaking like lightning in a bottle, but inconsistency plagued the squad. TBone alternated wins and losses like clockwork, dropping shootouts to Samurai, SilentX, and YOLO before rallying down the stretch with three straight wins to barely clinch a playoff berth. Once in, though, everything flipped — and TBone's luck, that eternal source of league-wide rage, decided to awaken.

In the postseason, the Manglers went full steakhouse mode — searing SilentXecution in the quarters (226.85–192.55), torching TD Master in the semis (272.00–196.45), and stumbling into the Super Bowl against Samurai's historic juggernaut. What followed was divine madness. Down late, TBone's last man standing, Navorro Bowman, fumbled an onside kick that looked like the final nail — only to immediately flip the script with a 99-yard interception return touchdown that swung 17.5 points and the championship in one motion. It was the "Bowman Bowl," an instant league legend and the unholy birth of TBone's second ring. While Samurai's dynasty-in-the-making was cut down by fate, TBone's was blessed by it.

The Manglers' mix of grit, timing, and outrageous luck turned a 7–6 shrug of a team into a two-time champion. Critics called it robbery; TBone called it destiny — because sometimes it's better to be lucky than legendary.

Summary: From steak to sizzle to Bowman's miracle — TBone didn't dominate 2013, he survived it... and walked away holding his second crown while the league screamed into the void.

Samurai — (10-3 | PF: 2968.58 | PA: 2548.86 | Silver Medal, Most Points Champion)

If there was ever a season where destiny should've been sealed, it was this one. Samurai didn't just lead the league — he defined it. Nearly 3,000 points for (a record set in just a 13-game season, before it was expanded to the current 14-game format), a 300+ point explosion that became myth, and a roster that looked hand-forged in a dojo. Jamaal Charles averaged 26.4 points per game and scored five touchdowns in one week, Josh Gordon went nuclear with back-to-back 200-yard games, and Calvin Johnson remained the Megatron every opponent feared. On defense, Karlos Dansby and Luke Kuechly commanded the middle like twin generals, while J.J. Watt occasionally lined up at tight end just to rub it in — grabbing goal-line touchdowns for good measure. Samurai's lineup wasn't just balanced; it was unfair.

He opened 0–2 with narrow defeats to TBone and the Headless Penguins, then awakened. What followed was an eleven-week clinic in domination — seven straight wins to close the season, a first-round bye, and a surgical semifinal victory over Headless Horseman (231.98–201.20). Everything pointed to destiny fulfilled. Then came the Bowman Bowl. In the final minutes of the Super Bowl, Samurai's victory was all but secured — until NaVorro Bowman fumbled an onside kick, costing TBone points... only to immediately intercept Matt Ryan and return it 99 yards for a touchdown, flipping the score and the history books in one play.

2013 became Samurai's masterpiece and his heartbreak — an epic campaign undone by fate's cruelest twist. Yet even in defeat, the legend grew. The warrior's discipline, dominance, and balance redefined the league's standard — and his blade, though bloodied, only sharpened for the redemption to come.

Summary: The dojo ruled the league, broke records (in thirteen games, no less), and lost to a single twist of fate — the season that proved Samurai wasn't just dominant; he was mythic.

TD Master — (9-4 | PF: 2687.19 | PA: 2475.12 | Bronze Medal)

The rookie came in like he'd been here before — Peyton Manning dropping 31 a game, Le'Veon Bell debuting with patient fury, and Tony Gonzalez proving age was just a stat line. TD Master's 2013 run was a highlight reel of fireworks, starting with a 254-point statement win over Headless Horseman in Week 1 and five straight 200-point games that announced the new kid wasn't scared of anyone. Manning's historic 55-TD season gave the squad an automatic weekly head start, while breakout WR Eric Decker and gadget star Cordarrelle Patterson added flash. When the touchdowns slowed, Le'Veon picked up the slack — a rookie who ran like he already owned the playbook.

The midseason stretch exposed some cracks — an 8-point loss to the Koalas here, a stumble to the Penguins there — but even then, the team rarely went quiet for long. The defense, led by A.J. Hawk and Charles Woodson, wasn't flashy but always finished the fight. Once the playoffs hit, TD Master delivered again: a narrow semifinal loss to TBone after scoring nearly 200, then a redemption torching of Headless Horseman in the bronze game (243.23–206.05). He didn't lift the trophy, but he left with one of the loudest rookie campaigns in league memory — a touchdown-driven warning shot to the veterans.

For a first-year manager, it was pure validation: the name fit, the swagger was real, and the future was already here.

Summary: TD Master's debut was all fireworks and near-misses — the rookie proved he could hang with legends and walk away with hardware on Day One.

Headless Horseman — (6-6-1 | PF: 2745.57 | PA: 2664.48 | 4th Place | later KillerFattys / Todamnlazy / im not QUIN)

If chaos had a mascot, it wore a pumpkin for a helmet in 2013. The Headless Horseman opened the season by tripping over his own saddle — three straight losses out of the gate — before clawing back from the grave to finish .500 and somehow land in the semifinals. The roster was pure volatility: Colin Kaepernick's highs and lows mirrored the manager's emotions, Matt Forte and Alshon Jeffery were the consistent heartbeat, and Julius Thomas came galloping out of nowhere to become Peyton Manning's red-zone scythe. When they clicked, this team looked like a top seed; when they didn't, it looked like it had lost its head (which, admittedly, fit the brand).

The defense was led by Vontaze Burfict — the league's premier chaos merchant — and DeAndre Levy, both putting up 16-plus per game and carrying matchups when the offense stumbled. Midseason was the sweet spot: a five-game run including a 261-point mauling of the Headless Penguins and a wild 221-point upset of TD Master in Week 8. The Horseman even delivered Samurai a scare before falling short in the semis, then dropped the third-place game to TD Master. The 2745 points scored ranked third in the league, proving this wasn't smoke and mirrors — it was just a wild ride with no brakes.

It was a year that perfectly captured the franchise's soul: unpredictable, dangerous, and completely allergic to calm. From here, the identity would mutate — KillerFattys, Todamnlazy, im not QUIN — but the spirit of beautiful chaos started right here, in the year the Horseman rode headfirst into league lore.

Summary: High points, low heads — the Horseman's 2013 run was a thrill ride of madness that proved chaos can still compete for medals.

SilentXecution — (7-6 | PF: 2600.25 | PA: 2632.60 | 5th Place)

SilentX rolled into 2013 with his usual mix of firepower and fury — a team built to score fast, hit hard, and break hearts. The offense was a sledgehammer: Matthew Stafford flinging 22 points a game to A.J. Green and Anquan Boldin, while DeMarco Murray and Marshawn Lynch turned every Sunday into a street fight. Behind them, Zac Stacy emerged as the unheralded hammer that kept this team balanced. Week after week, SilentX traded blows with the league's best — starting 2-0 with wins over Carlos Danger and TBone Manglers, then surviving a midseason storm of close calls and heartbreakers that turned a 5-2 start into a grind for playoff position. The defense lived up to the name — silent, but deadly. Lance Briggs and Paul Worrilow anchored a tackling factory, while T.J. Ward and Mychal Kendricks punished anyone foolish enough to test the secondary. Still, luck rarely broke his way: five of SilentX's six losses came against playoff teams, and he missed another deep run by inches. He dropped his quarterfinal to TBone Manglers despite scoring nearly 200, another reminder that in the No Pain universe, even execution can be outdone by fortune.

Summary: The executioner's axe swung true all year, but fate dodged every swing — SilentX delivered points, pain, and another haunting case of “what could've been.”

YOLO — (9-4 | PF: 2494.24 | PA: 2475.42 | 6th Place)

True to the name, YOLO only lived once — but what a single life it was. The debut franchise arrived in 2013 with reckless confidence and just enough firepower to back it up. Andy Dalton and Big Ben tag-teamed under center like an unhinged two-QB experiment gone right, slinging bombs to T.Y. Hilton and Vernon Davis while Chris Johnson and Frank Gore churned yards like workhorses who'd missed the memo about rest days. The offense wasn't elite, but it was scrappy, capable of punching above its weight — and it did, rolling to a 9-4 regular-season record with big wins over TBone Manglers, SilentXecution, and the Koalas.

Defensively, YOLO brought hustle and hit power. Alec Ogletree, Erin Henderson, and Danny Trevathan each averaged 16 a game, forming a quietly excellent linebacker trio that kept the team afloat in tight games. But when the playoffs came, the gas tank hit empty. A flat quarterfinal loss to Headless Horseman ended the run, and just like that, the franchise vanished — no keeper carryovers, no offseason chatter, no explanation. The league soon dubbed them “You Only Post Once,” a one-and-done enigma that flashed potential and disappeared before anyone could decide if it was real.

Summary: YOLO went 9-4, swung hard, and vanished — a one-season wonder that lived loud, died quick, and left the league wondering what might've been if they'd lived twice.

Razin — (5-8 | PF: 2609.33 | PA: 2587.15 | 7th Place | Consolation Champion)

The defending champ entered 2013 like a rockstar fresh off a world tour — still loud, still confident, but maybe running on fumes. Drew Brees and Philip Rivers gave Razin a dual-quarterback arsenal that could light up any scoreboard, and Jimmy Graham's 20-point average at tight end kept the champagne flowing early. But the high faded fast. Opponents came swinging like they'd circled his name in red, and suddenly the titleholder was catching punches instead of throwing them. By midseason, Razin sat 1-6 — outscored but never outclassed — losing tight games to YOLO, Samurai, and SilentXecution that all swung by 20 or fewer.

Even with the hangover, the numbers stayed strong. He still cracked 2,600 points thanks to Brees' weekly fireworks, Andre Johnson's quiet consistency, and Giovani Bernard's rookie spark. On defense, Derrick Johnson and James Laurinaitis were tackling machines, while Eric Berry and Morgan Burnett locked down the secondary. Once Razin shook off the slump, he rattled off four straight wins, including payback against YOLO and a 255-point explosion versus Carlos Danger. But by then, the playoff gates were closed — the king dethroned before he could defend the crown.

It wasn't a fall; it was a reset. The league learned Razin wouldn't go quietly, and the villain learned that even champions need to bleed before the next rise.

Summary: Razin's title defense burned bright, then crashed hard — a hangover season of close calls, loud numbers, and the first taste of hunger that would fuel his comeback.

Sarah's Great Team — (3-10 | PF: 2316.72 | PA: 2763.75 | 8th Place)

Ironically named, tragically played. Sarah's Great Team had the roster of a contender and the record of a cautionary tale. On paper, it looked dangerous — Aaron Rodgers, LeSean McCoy, Andrew Luck, Demaryius Thomas, and rookie Eddie Lacy headlined what should've been an offensive juggernaut. But while the talent was great, the timing was not. Rodgers went down midseason, matchups went sideways, and every week felt like running into a buzzsaw. The team's 2763 points allowed set a league record for most points against, meaning every opponent seemed to save their season-high just for her.

Despite the wreckage, there were moments of life. McCoy ranked top-three among running backs, Thomas delivered weekly fireworks, and Luck proved to be a future cornerstone — just not soon enough to stop the bleeding. Defensively, Nick Roach quietly anchored the middle, while veterans like DeMarcus Ware and Adam "Pacman" Jones fought to keep games respectable. Three wins — over TBone, the Penguins, and Carlos Danger — were the few bright spots in an otherwise cursed campaign. By year's end, "Sarah's Great Team" had become the league's favorite punchline, but even punchlines get remembered.

Summary: Loaded roster, brutal luck — Sarah's Great Team proved that in fantasy football, greatness on paper means nothing if everyone else saves their best week for you.

Thundering Koalas — (6-6-1 | PF: 2510.59 | PA: 2482.45 | 9th Place | formerly Monstrous Malresse, later Las Vegas Gold, VEGAS GOLD)

The Thundering Koalas once again lived up to their paradox of a name — loud in potential, soft in execution. With Tony Romo and Dez Bryant leading the offense, and Rob Gronkowski returning to his spike-happy ways, the Koalas looked built to compete. Add in Larry Fitzgerald's veteran steadiness and Danny Woodhead's Swiss-army versatility, and you had the blueprint for a balanced squad. The problem? The manager apparently went on vacation midseason. Waivers gathered dust while lineups sat unchanged, and even when the starters delivered, the silence behind the scenes was deafening.

Still, the Koalas weren't a pushover. They opened with big wins over TD Master and Wild Card, dropped a midseason tie against the Headless Horseman, and occasionally woke from hibernation to upset playoff contenders — including a 209-point win over Razin to end the year. Defensively, D'Qwell Jackson and Philip Wheeler quietly anchored a unit that did its job without flair or fanfare. But like every Koalas season before and after, the lack of moves and midweek engagement cost them dearly. By December, they were once again the league's great "what if?" — the sleeping giant that never bothered to set an alarm.

Summary: Loaded roster, zero hustle — the Thundering Koalas stayed true to form, proving you can't thunder your way through fantasy if you nap through waivers

Headless Penguins — (6-7 | PF: 2530.50 | PA: 2609.91 | 10th Place | formerly Angry Penguins; later Project Mayhem and Super Saiyan)

After a promising 2012 debut, the Penguins returned headless — and it showed. Their 2013 run was defined by flashes of brilliance and long stretches of confusion, a team that could drop 240 one week and forget how to score the next. Robert Griffin III was the quarterback version of a light switch, Knowshon Moreno finally remembered how to be relevant, and rookie DeAndre Hopkins began to reveal his future superstar form. Add in Jordan Cameron's breakout and Harry Douglas' random explosions, and the offense was pure volatility.

But the defense was where the heart still beat. Rookie linebacker Kiko Alonso went berserk, averaging 18 points per game and earning Defensive Rookie of the Year honors. Lavonte David and Paul Posluszny anchored an IDP trio that kept the team competitive even when the offense shorted out. The Penguins finished with a losing record but always with noise — a 246-point upset over Samurai proved they could still bite when provoked.

This was the messy, molting season before rebirth — the chaos cocoon that would one day hatch Project Mayhem and, later, Super Saiyan. The raw power was there, it just needed discipline and a new identity.

Summary: The Penguins' 2013 meltdown was the chrysalis — chaos, promise, and the spark that would evolve into Mayhem and beyond.

Wild Card — (5-8 | PF: 2634.29 | PA: 2704.53 | 11th Place)

No Pain's resident gambler doubled down on chaos in 2013 and got burned by the deck. Wild Card started hot, upsetting the defending champ Razin in Week 1 and following with another win in Week 2. Then the dice turned. Six straight losses later, the season was in ashes, saved only by a few late shootout wins that reminded everyone why this franchise is never boring.

Russell Wilson and Alex Smith split quarterback duties — a gamble that sometimes worked and sometimes imploded. Brandon Marshall and DeSean Jackson lit up defenses, while Doug Martin's injury derailed what could've been stability at RB. On defense, Paul Posluszny and Jerrell Freeman delivered consistency in a sea of chaos, but the high-scoring losses piled up too fast to matter.

He did leave with one masterpiece — a 261-point eruption against the Koalas in Week 12 — a “casino jackpot” game that proved the danger of ever counting him out. But streaks define gamblers, and Wild Card's were mostly bad beats.

Summary: He started with a hot hand, went ice cold, and still made noise at the table — Wild Card's 2013 was a gambler's tale: entertaining, unlucky, and pure No Pain.

Carlos Danger — (4-9 | PF: 2328.84 | PA: 2562.03 | 12th Place)

Carlos Danger made his debut like a tabloid headline you couldn't look away from. His draft was equal parts brilliance and impulse — Tom Brady, Adrian Peterson, and Reggie Wayne fronted an offense that should've worked, but chemistry never showed up. For every Brady bomb there was a wrong lineup swap, for every Adrian Peterson sprint a misfired flex start.

The defense, however, was no joke. Sean Lee was a tackling monster, Patrick Willis still played like a warlord, and Mark Barron smacked receivers into next week. Unfortunately, even with a gritty defensive foundation, the offense stumbled through inconsistency and bad luck. His four wins came mostly against the league's bottom half, hardly a résumé-builder.

But Carlos Danger's rookie season did make one thing clear — this manager was entertaining. Unpredictable, reckless, and oddly magnetic. Even in 11th place, he left everyone waiting for the sequel.

Summary: Carlos Danger's first year was tabloid fantasy at its finest — messy, unpredictable, and impossible to ignore.

Stats & Quirks

Champion: TBone Manglers

Silver Medal: Samurai

Bronze Medal: TD Master

Consolation Champion: Razin

Most Points (Payout): Samurai — 2,968.58 PF

Lowest PF: Sarah's Great Team — 2,316.72

Fewest PA: Razin — 2,587.15

Most PA: Sarah's Great Team — 2,763.75

Closest Game: Samurai 215.62 – TD Master 214.09 (Week 7 nail-biter that nearly cost Samurai his bye)

Biggest Blowout: Samurai 306.42 – Carlos Danger 164.21

Heartbreak of the Year: The Bowman Bowl — Samurai's sure victory stolen by Bowman's fumble and redemption pick-six

Upset of the Year: Tbone Manglers over Samurai (Super Bowl)

Comeback of the Year: TBone Manglers' playoff miracle run from 7–6 to Champion

Offensive Rookie of the Year: Le'Veon Bell (TD Master)

Defensive Rookie of the Year: Kiko Alonso (Headless Penguins)

Offensive MVP: Jamaal Charles (Samurai)

Defensive MVP: NaVorro Bowman (TBone Manglers)

Waiver Wire King: TD Master — mastered the market from Day 1

Scandal of the Year: TBone's miracle dubbed "Bowmangate" — a defensive score the league still swears was scripted

League Villain: TBone Manglers

Punching Bag: Sarah's Great Team

Obituary

YOLO (You Only Post Once) — a 9–4 debut, a playoff run, and then instant retirement. Gone but memed forever.

Season Summary

2013 will forever be remembered as The Bowman Bowl — the year fate took the controller from human hands. Samurai fielded one of the most statistically dominant teams in No Pain history: nearly 3,000 points in a 13-game season, a 300+ week, and the balance of a master at work. Yet destiny spun the wheel the other way. In the most dramatic play ever witnessed, NaVorro Bowman's 99-yard pick-six flipped the championship and crowned TBone Manglers a two-time champion.

TD Master exploded onto the scene with a bronze-medal debut, Headless Horseman returned to chaos and nearly stormed the dojo, and SilentXecution's axe stayed sharp but unlucky. Razin's reign ended in hangover fashion, Sarah's Great Team couldn't dodge bad luck, and the Koalas proved again that talent without effort is just a nap. The Headless Penguins melted down only to begin their slow rebirth into Project Mayhem and Super Saiyan, Carlos Danger made his scandalous debut, and Wild Card's casino of chaos stayed open late — but always lost at closing time.

And then there was YOLO — a one-season comet that burned bright and vanished, leaving only memes in its wake.

If 2012 was the league's first true war, 2013 was its first tragedy — a year where skill bowed to fate, luck rewrote legends, and No Pain learned that sometimes, the football gods have a wicked sense of humor.

